The most important objectives of dog breeding laws are ensuring that dogs are treated in a correct manner, that due attention is give to the health condition of dogs and laws of various societies attempt to protect dogs from the harmful effects of interbreeding. Practically this is carried out through yearly inspection of dog breeding facilities made with the objective of ensuring that proper standards are maintained in such facilities. If the conditions seem to be unacceptable opportunity is given to correct the shortcomings and legal action is exceptional.

Generally federal dog breeding laws come under the 1970 Animal Welfare Act but of course there could be differences in laws on this regard between different states. There are certain deficiencies when it comes to the implementation of dog breeding laws. Those breeding facilities which do not adhere to the federal laws on this regard take years to be prosecuted and the facility operator in question often doesn't even lose his/her license and this is seen by some as an encouragement of animal cruelty.

With the improvement in the power of various animal rights groups in the recent past however perhaps the situation has improved. Those who don't adhere to dog breeding laws have often come under criticism from such groups and the negative publicity has often provided enough encouragement for those individuals to mend their ways. Thus perhaps in the future maybe we would see much stricter implementation of dog breeding laws and this is perhaps very good news to all those dog lovers out there.

As mentioned before clubs and societies for dog breeders have their own laws and after inspection of premises of members who are dog breeders they issue certification to people who comply with these laws. These clubs could also provide you with detailed information regarding state and federal dog breeding laws and anyone who is curious could find out any such information from such clubs and societies. The practical implementation of dog breeding laws has greatly been aided by the existence of such organizations. Therefore perhaps the secret to a better doggy future lies in the growth and development of such organizations.
