Types of Dog Bedding

There are dog beds, and then there is what would probably be more properly called dog bedding. Bedding would be not just the accessories like blankets and throws, but also beds that change shape, sometimes behaving almost like blankets, and sometimes resembling real discernible beds. Dogs are often content to sleep wherever they feel comfortable, whether it's at the foot of your own bed, on the couch, or on a layer of several towels in the corner. But if you are their human friend, then you may enjoy getting them one of the quality dog beds and then adding various accessories, including special bedding, for them.

Some bedding for dogs is as simple as a bunch of blankets. If that's the sort of bed your dog likes, then you can get these at places like the Salvation Army or other second hand stores. You don't necessarily have to get elaborate with them, especially if you use them mainly to line the dog's crate or to cover furniture. Yet many websites or stores where there are dog beds for sale will also have blankets, throws, and variations on them, designed especially for your dog. Some specially created blankets may have inserts for heating pads, or might be designed to wrap and towel off the dog after a bath.

There is also dog bedding that doesn't quite fall into a defined shape like a bed with a frame, but is far more elaborate than a throw or a blanket. This type of bed would include something like the Pawds created at the Le Pet Petite Boutique website (www.furfection.com). These luxurious dog beds are circular and very plush. They can lie flat, providing a thick, airy bed, or the ties that go around the edges can cinch together, pulling those edges in to create a round, walled nest for the dog to curl up in.

Other dog bedding serves a functional purpose other than just giving the dog something to lie on. For example, the Scottish dog supplies company, Tuffies, makes a cover for their beds that can wick away moisture, so that a wet dog can stay lying on a fairly dry cover and not be soggy and damp as it's drying off. There are many different categories of bedding, and many bed accessories that accompany them. Whether you're looking at simple blankets or quite elaborate beds and bedding setups, you have countless options for making your dog's sleeping arrangements comfortable.
