Using Treats In Your Basset Hound Training

When training a basset hound, it's very essential to take into account his personality before deciding what training technique should be employed. You can't simply use a certain method you stumbled across the web or that new training instrument your neighbor has been talking about. You should observe your canine friend and exactly how he behaves to different situations, gather and look into the recommendation of several pet owners and if possible, consult a dog expert, professional or experienced dog owner.

While potty training is reportedly tough with this particular breed, training a basset hound with positive reinforcement in addition to gentle and patient handling can help you get desirable dog training result. In positive reinforcement, you use something in the situation in the hopes of encouraging the pet to repeat the behavior. Reinforcement could be toys, praise, time to play and obviously, the most commonly used, the treats.

Rewarding your four-legged friend with that tasty small pieces of food each time he did something appropriate can certainly help him figure out that he gets good things for obeying your commands. It'll also help him associate the command with the action.

When training using treats, it is recommended to keep the treat clear of your dog's sight instead of showing it to him. For example the lesson for the day is sit. One method is to hold a treat in front of your pet's nose and then gradually move your hands upward so that he will follow it. But instead of holding it with your fingers, it is better to keep the treat in your fist to ensure that he can only smell it but not see it. Though it'll make him wonder if there's really a treat inside, he'll still be motivated to obey. The process can help him avoid becoming food dependent.

Food treats must be really rewarding for your pet – liver, cheese or hotdog are often favored by dogs of all sizes. Make certain that treats won't cause health hazard and remember not to use them as replacement for staple food.
